

Paris, June 3rd.—The King of Greece, accompanied by the Greek Minister, yesterday visited Verdun and conferred the Hellenic war cross on the city. He paid a long visit to the battlefield and was profoundly touched by the spectacle of desolation around the city, whose name for all the Allies is synonymous with supreme heroism.

Paris June 4th.—The Executive Council of the League of Nations will meet shortly in London, for the purpose of discussing the suitable course to be adopted with regard to the request for intervention presented by the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Rome June 3d.—The King has signed a decree creating a Ministry of Labour and Social matters.

Paris June 4th.—No confirmation has been received here of the reported entry of the Bolshevik forces into Teheran.

A very pretty wedding took place last evening in the Reformed Dutch Church, when Mr. Charles O. Granberg married Miss Marion Blanche Souffront, eldest daughter of Mr. Jules H. and the late Mrs. Souffront of this island. The bride was led to the altar by her father. She was beautifully gowned in white silk, and carried a lovely shower bouquet of white flowers. The ceremony was performed by Rev. J. Folensbee, pastor of the church, Mrs. Folensbee singing as a solo "O Promise Me". After the ceremony, a few friends of the family were received at the residence of the bride's father, where the health of the happy couple was proposed by Mr. George Levi.

We take the pleasure in wishing the newly married pair a long and happy union.—Com.—St. Thomas Mail Notes, 1st June.

The British steamer "Lansdowne", of Ottawa was bought this morning by the St. Thomas Shipbrokers' Association for the sum of $13,350, U. S. currency. Mr Chas. W. Daniel was the auctioneer.—Ibid.

RED CROSS HEROES.

Correspondent Tells of Deed of Splendid Bravery.

From Hill 212, overlooking Fore-an-Tardenois and the valley of the Ourcq, William Slavens McNutt, Colliers's correspondent, watched the American infantry start the Germans on their final retreat from Reims-Soissons-Chateau Thierry pocket. He says:

"And then I saw the most painfully dramatic thing I have witnessed in all this war. Out from the little strip of wood that the Americans had just captured, walking slowly out into that open, bullet-swept field over which the charge had passed, I saw two men with the braesard of the Red Cross on their arms bearing a wounded man on a litter. They had perhaps 300 yards to go back across that open field before the curve of the hill would shelter them from the machine gun fire from the hill above. And they could not run, they could not duck, they could not take cover. They must walk upright on their work of mercy, walk upright in that storm of lead, and, walk slowly for the burden they bore!

"There go two men," the captain said solemnly. "They haven't got a chance in that field. The machine gun will get 'em sure! Watch!"

I watched. I have never watched anything so intently in my life. And with all the fervency of reverence and belief that there was in me, I prayed for those two men of mercy over there who could not fight back; those men who had made the charge up the hill with their comrades of the gun and bayonet, and must now march back bearing a wounded fighting man to safety; back through that storm of lead that was sweeping the field from the big wood—march back standing straight and walking slow. So slow!

They had made perhaps a hundred yards when one of them slipped to his knees and rolled over.

"I told you" the captain exclaimed, "They've got 'em!"

"Only one," I said. "The other fellow's not hit."

"They'll get him," the captain prophesied gloomily.

I saw the unwounded man kneel by his stricken comrade. For the space of a minute he knelt there. I suppose applying first aid. Then he stood erect. And then the man who had been hit, the stretcher bearer on the ground, rose slowly—oh, so very slowly—till he was propped up on one elbow. Then to his knees. Slow! Then very, very slowly he got to his feet. Once up, he leaned over—and, from where I was, through my glasses I could see by the movement the pain it cost—leaned over, grasped the handles of the litter, and straightened up again. He had been hit, but he was going on!

On they went. I have no power to describe how slowly they seemed to be moving across that deadly open field. A hundred yards! Another hundred would mean comparative safety under the slope of the hill. Fifty of that accomplished! Twenty five more! And then, slowly yet, they vanished from sight under the protective slope. They had made it!

I think I shouted, I know I tried to, and I know that my knees were suddenly too weak to hold me up and I abruptly knelt and grasped the slim pole of the little lone tree near by to steady myself. —Red Cross Bulletin.

A MILLION DOLLARS IN AMERICAN DRUGS

The American Red Cross gave outright $1,000,000 to purchase drugs and other medical supplies for French soldiers, during the dark days of the war, when the French Red Cross found itself unable to provide for the 780,000 wounded men lying ill in the hospitals. This is only part of the assistance rendered the French women war workers by the American organization, according to Countess d' Hassonville, a prominent French woman.

On the occasion of the closing of the war time co-operative arrangement between the French and the American organizations, the Countess declared that the work of the ten thousand French women who cared for France's three-quarters of a million wounded men would have been impossible save for American aid.—Every Day Life.
